

Digital Humanities in the Library

Support, Advocacy, Maintenance, and Preservation

A presentation by Elli Mylonas, Director of the Center for Digital Scholarship, Brown University Library, about pioneering efforts on Digital Humanities research infrastructure and support in university libraries.

The Center for Digital Scholarship, a cross-departmental group in the Brown University Library, supports digital scholarship for the Brown community and beyond by supporting scholarly and academic activities that are conducted or enhanced through the use of digital technology, or that engage with its effects. Mylonas will present this center, its planning, evolution, and how it has affected research, infrastructure, physical facilities, and intellectual community at Brown University, one of the leading Ivy League research universities in the USA. Her presentation will be followed by a roundtable discussion of UiB research leaders focused on the future of the Digital Humanities at the University of Bergen.

Elli Mylonas

Brown University Library

Elli Mylonas is the Director of the Center for Digital Scholarship in the Brown University Library, as well as being a subject liaison to several departments. Previously, she was the Senior Digital Humanities Librarian. Her work focuses on identifying, developing and implementing a variety of digital projects with Brown faculty, and providing DH outreach in the form of workshop series and consultations. In these overlapping roles, she has to discover productive collaborations between librarians in traditional roles and the emerging digital activities. Elli serves on the Technical Council of the Text Encoding Initiative and has been involved in Digital Humanities since her participation in the Perseus Project. She is a graduate of Harvard University and did graduate work in Classics at Brown University.
